THE WEATHER

Equatorial Guinea is characterized by enjoying a distinctly equatorial climate, characteristic of the areas near the equator. This climate is very similar to the tropical one: both share low thermal amplitudes and high temperatures. The biggest difference is that the rainy period in the tropical climate is more irregular and less intense, while in the equatorial climate the rainfall is very abundant and regular, and usually exceeds 1,500 or 2,000 mm per year.

From then on, each of the regions of Equatorial Guinea has its own characteristics.

ISLAND REGION: BOKO AND ANNOBÓN

In the Island Region we find an equatorial climate in Bioko, with a dry season, from November to March and a rainy season from April to October. The climate is temperate, influenced by warm marine currents and the relief of the island, with a monsoon component in its southern part and an average annual temperature of 25° C, which can oscillate around 2° C.

The climate of Annobón is similar, with a dry season from June to October and a wet season from November to May. The average annual temperature is usually 26° C.

CONTINENTAL REGION

The climate of the continental region has two dry seasons: the first of them occurs between December and mid-February and the second and most important, from July to September. We can also find two rainy seasons: one from March to June and the other from September to November.

In the continental region, the average annual temperature is around 25° C, with an oscillation that does not exceed 5° C. The main rainfall occurs between the months of September and December, from 1,800 to 3,800 mm, and the relative humidity is around 90%, dropping to 85% in the dry season.

The wettest areas are in the mountainous area of Mount Mithras and on the border with Gabon, in the Minetele basin.

THE RELIEF

As the country is divided into two zones, the Insular and the Continental, the geographical and relief variety of Guinea is as wide as it is rich.

The Continental Zone

It is made up of a part of the coast that becomes more mountainous as we go inland, where we find a series of chains called "of the Seven Mountains". One of the greatest riches of Equatorial Guinea is precisely the exuberant and lush jungles that we find in these lands of gentle undulations.

The relief of the Continental Region can be grouped into three types of formations:

- The coastal area, made of sandstones and marls.
- The interior area, mainly gneiss.
- The eastern area, granitic.

Orography of the Continental Region:

- 1.- Kie-Ntem Plateau: descends to the west and continues to the coast through the Ntem peneplain.
- 2.- Central peneplain: descends towards the Muni and Mitemele basins and is furrowed by rocky outcrops.
- 3.- Mongouba Platform: it is found in the eastern area of the Niefang Chain, with peaks that reach an altitude of 1,200 m.
- 4.-Mithra Massif: we find the highest areas of the Continental Region: those of Mount Mithras or Mount Alen, in the south of the Niefang Chain.
- 5.-The Muni and Minetele basin: this is a trench between the Niefang chain, on the one hand, and the Crystal Mountains, on the other.
- 6.-Penplain west of the Niefang Chain.

The island area

The island of Bioko is of volcanic origin and therefore mountainous and also very jungle. From any part of its surface we can be amazed to contemplate the silhouette of the Basile peak, formerly known as Santa Isabel peak. As for Annobón, its physiognomy is also of volcanic origin, composed mainly of basaltic rocks.

OROGRAPHY OF THE ISLAND REGION

- 1.- Bioko. The island is divided into a northern and a southern block, separated by a central depression near Musola, and is part of the volcanic chain that crosses diagonally from Lake Chad to Ascension Island.

It is of volcanic origin, with a landscape of deep valleys and steep reliefs. The island is made up entirely of volcanic rocks. We find three calderas: Pico Basile (3,011 m), in the north and Pico Biao (2,009 m) and the Gran Caldera de Luba (2,261 m) in the south.

- 2.- Annobón. It is located in the volcanic mountain range, mentioned above, along with Bioko, São Tomé and Príncipe.

Highlights:

- 1.- Caldera del lago A Pot.
- 2.- Crater of the southern area in the east of Punta Manjob.
- 3.- Corridor that joins the Bays of San Pedro and Santa Cruz, crossed by the Anganchi River.

VEGETATION

Despite the small size of the country and due to its landscape diversity, Equatorial Guinea is one of the areas with the greatest biodiversity in Africa, as we can find everything from the classic beaches with black volcanic sand, to incredibly lush forests or alpine lands at an altitude of 3,000 metres. Aware of this wealth, the government has set aside almost 20% of the country's land for the conservation of natural life.

THE FLORA OF THE CONTINENTAL REGION

At least three-quarters of the Continental Region is covered by huge forest formations. Among them, the predominant one is the perennial shady forest, also called humid forest. This type of forest is typical of the tropical or equatorial climate and is characterized, precisely, by the density and height of the plant formations that occupy it.

In addition, a large part of this area is occupied by crops and fallows, which give rise to huge thickets of bushes and lianas through which it is almost impossible to enter and which serve as a refuge for a huge and very rich wildlife.

THE FLORA OF THE ISLAND REGION

In Bioko, below 700 m – the maximum altitude for cocoa cultivation – cocoa, coffee and banana plantations occupy most of the forest area, although much of it remains unexploited today. The vegetation, similar to that of the mainland, has only been maintained in some areas.

In the southern part of the island, we find a type of rainforest, rich in orchids, thanks to the 10,000 mm of water it receives per year.

The perennial shady forest develops from 700 m to 1,800 m, with a large number of tree ferns. From that altitude, meadows appear along with low plant formations. On the Basile peak we find formations of ericaceous plants.

In the northern area of Annobón grows savannah and deciduous tree formations, since the climate of the island is less rainy. In the south, the tree zone is much denser due to the influence of the monsoon.

THE FAUNA

Guinea's animal population is in luck, as they live in a country where nature is still as great as it is unspoiled, but where, in addition, development allows appropriate measures to be taken for its conservation in the future.

More than a hundred different mammals are part of this fauna: small antelopes, pangolins, felines. The country is especially rich in primate diversity: gorillas, chimpanzees, baboons, colobus, etc. But in Guinea you can also find some specimens of large mammals such as the jungle elephant, the hippopotamus, the potamoquero or the manatee.

Equally numerous are the species of reptiles and amphibians, and four species of sea turtles that frequent the coastline stand out.

In the coral reefs of Corisco we find a marine fauna that is not common in Central Africa. It is also important to mention the coast of Moka, near Ureca, in Bioko, as one of the most privileged places in the area to observe the laying of sea turtle eggs.

Also noteworthy is the very rich inventory of Equatoguinean birds, with more than three hundred known species: as well as that of aquatic fauna, with more than 167 species of fish registered. Both inventories are initiated, but are still incomplete.

Likewise, the world of insects, of extraordinary diversity, has yet to be inventoried.

GASTRONOMY

Equatoguinean gastronomy offers a wide variety of dishes and is influenced by both African and European cuisine.

In the rural area, the basis of the diet is meat and fish and, in the big cities, we can find restaurants where you can taste both traditional African food and Western dishes, especially Spanish, such as potato omelette or paella.

Currently, in the two large cities, Malabo and Bata, you can already find hotels with a wide range of menus, as well as pizzerias or small restaurants where the gastronomy of the area is combined with more Western food. There are no very strict rules regarding the schedule, so it is easy to eat anything at any time of the day, until the time of closing.

The main difference between African and European cuisine lies in the use of sauces made from typical products of the country such as peanuts, pumpkin, modica, yams or ocro. Another clearly differentiating element is the inclusion of wild animals in the preparation of some dishes.

Fish is also an important part of the national gastronomy. When it comes to tasting it, it is worth looking for those places where we will be served an exquisite freshly caught piece, and simply order it grilled. In some villages we can even be served an incredible freshly caught lobster. Nor should you miss, if possible, a delicious dish of typical snails or bilolás.

Pepesup (spicy fish soup) is one of the staples of Equatoguinean cuisine, as is pangolin with chocolate, bambucha or peanut soup. And almost all of them are usually accompanied by rice or banana.

One of the main secrets of Guinean cuisine is the use of the condiment called andok, which is harvested for local consumption, but which, in times of good harvests, is also exported to other countries.

The typical drinks are palm wine or topé (comes from the palm tree) and malamba (sugar cane), although today the most popular drink is beer and wine, more appreciated by tourists, since you can find their favorite brands almost anywhere, and it is especially pleasant to face the hot and humid tropical environment.

In the typical markets of Guinea we can also find a huge variety of fruits and vegetables, such as papaya, pineapple, banana, banana, avocado, mango, coconut, bisong, guava, engong and a long etcetera that are truly exceptional, both for their size and for their quality and flavor.

ETHNICITIES, CULTURES AND LANGUAGES

Almost the entire population, with the exception of the Pygmies, belongs to the Bantu people. More than seventy million individuals belong to this denomination that extend throughout Central, East and Southern Africa.

Despite the great ethnic and cultural variety that shares the territory, and unlike what unfortunately happens in other African countries, in Equatorial Guinea today, different cultures coexist peacefully.

ETHNICITIES AND CULTURES

Fangs. They form the largest ethnic group, traditionally their coexistence is structured in relatively autonomous families, clans and tribes. Offspring are transmitted by males, hence the importance of the father, uncle and firstborn. Its wooden sculptures, masks and Fangs ritual statues are appreciated all over the world.

Bubis. They are located on the island of Bioko and are Bantu belonging to the so-called "yam civilization", their society was structured in the form of a kingdom that was maintained until the end of the colonial period. Their original religion was monotheistic and the music, dance and traditional singing were inspired by religious ceremonies that are still deeply rooted.

Ndowés. They are a minority people, made up of numerous clans: the Kombe, the Bujeba, the Bapuku, the Balenke, the Enviko and the Benga. Their social organization is hierarchical in families, towns, lineages and clans.

Bisios. Originally from Cameroon, they are few in number and migrated in the nineteenth century to the nearby coastal regions of the continental region, via the Ntem River.

Annobonese. They are found on the island of Annobón and are a mixture of Portuguese, Spanish and slaves of African descent, they have traditionally been fishermen, since agriculture is scarce on the island as it is a volcanic land, they use canoes known as cayucos, made of ceiba wood. Most are fluent in the Fá d'Ambô dialect, which is a Portuguese Creole mixed with Spanish.

Fernandinos and criollos. A bourgeoisie of landowners and merchants, who lived for a long time in the capital and were mestizo descendants of workers who settled over centuries on the plantations of the island of Bioko.

Pygmies. In Equatorial Guinea they are called Beyeles and Bokuigns, they live in small groups and are dedicated to hunting and gathering wild roots and berries.

LANGUAGES AND DIALECTS

Spanish is the official administrative and teaching language. French is the second official language, Portuguese the third official language, and almost all ethnic groups speak the so-called Bantu languages.
